Abstract In cities, the number of prohibited areas is increasing day by day, and as a result, the space necessary for the discovery of the child's space and, consequently, his world is reduced. While the game requires private realm, and practically this area is often the limited space of the child's room. It is not anticipated for collective play, therefore, the need for more general spaces to meet the needs of children, as well as the neutralization of the cramped constraints of today's urbanization, is felt more and more. The viewing of children in a playground shows that their encounters Numerous and their domination of space is perfect, and it is difficult to impose a limited environment on them. They can have a changeable space in order to get their footprint in place and thereby create their own special points. Moving, ruining, building, and so on are activities that allow him to create a world of scale. She gives herself.
