Roughaye taheri*,

The issue of women's rights has been considered and analyzed throughout history and in different societies and many efforts have been done to achieve justice and promote women's rights. Iranian Civil Code which originated Islam and divine revelation, in order to support the rights of women in permanent and temporary marriage has set financial and non-financial rights in proportion to the natural and inherent characteristics of woman. There are some rights which have been placed for the wife and the husband is obliged to carry them out mutually, such as dowry, alimony, Ajrat Almasal, inheritance etc. There are also tasks which they both obliged to carry out and follow, like trying to intensify and strengthen family foundations and good companionship and assistance and so forth. Making above rights and duties is affected marriage contract, whether the parties considered them while writing or not. Factors such as disobedience bring down some part of that rights and duties. Some of these rights and obligations are of jus cogens that by the will of the parties are not scrapable through the condition, but some are scrapable. Some of these rights are limited to permanent marriage and women in temporary marriage are deprived of them. The parties of any contract, to supply their demands and also avoid any potential losses, are able to propose provisions that are not opposed to reason and religion while the contract and thus subject the fulfillment of their obligations in the contract to the fulfillment of the mentioned conditions. Of important issues that have been very controversial in this research is women's rights observance in determining these rights in permanent and temporary marriage. So it was expected that rules pay more attention to women's rights which today play as one of the mainstays of the family and the rules relating to permanent and temporary marriage should be established for the good of the family and society. But in temporary marriage, this matter is not so important for legislator and in the matter of women in marriage the focus of legislator is on the rights of women permanent marriage. In general the legislator for the interest and support of the wife in temporary marriage has not taken many efforts for material and intellectual rights of the wife, while it is very important for future of the wife.
