

Investigating the Impact of the Local Management Role in the Development of Villages in the Khoshk bejar

Morteza Moghadam Khajani*, Dr. Esa pour Ramezan,

Looking at rural management in Iran in the years before and after the revolution, in most cases, there is a weakness and a vacuum of rural management in the country. The formation of Islamic councils of the village and the subsequent establishment of the organizations as the newest organization in the rural management system after the victory of the Islamic Revolution could be regarded as a positive step towards attracting more rural people participation in rural management and development. Rural local rural management, namely, Dejariyah, under the direct supervision of the people's representatives of the village (Islamic councils) and the government's control and policy (governorates) in the village play a role in the field. In this research, the fieldwork and documents examine the role of managers in Rural development has been a descriptive-analytic research method and the statistical population of the villages in the dry section is the results. The results show that rural management in the dry section has made all its efforts for rural development.
