

Theoretical and Practical Explanation of the Nordic Countries Development the Perspective of Good Governance

Mojtaba Moradzadeh*,

The concept of good governance emerged as a way to manage the country or the relationship between citizens and rulers 1990s. The term has been on the agenda of development institutions now for more than 20 years and it has become indispensable in development co-operation. In fact, it was introduced as the practice of political, economic, and executive management of a country's resources to achieve its goals. In recent years, the growth and prosperity of the Nordic countries, including Sweden, Norway, Finland and Denmark, has led to an analysis of the model of development of these countries in the form of a concept called "good governance". These countries were able to provide a general welfare for a large number of their own people, as well as a favorable and desirable business environment by carrying out principle and essential mechanisms in the field of government effectiveness and efficiency, fighting corruption, good and effective laws, the right to comment and accountability and political stability, which are the indicators of good governance. These countries have managed to achieve a lot in solving social problems and crises. Moreover, they have worked very well in terms of productivity and well-being, the highest levels of education, respect the environment, equal opportunities for women and men. The current study aimed to investigate the importance of good governance and its indicators in the development of the Nordic countries and the cause of creating a proper conception of these countries.
