Mohsen Kimiaee*,

One of the facts that has focused on the attention of the international community today is the rights of the fetus. One of the fundamental goals of all legal systems is to develop strategies to ensure the rights of the fetus, both financially and non-financially. Hence, Iranian civil law and special laws such as British law on fetal rights, such as family protection laws of 1353 and 1391, have emphasized the observance of fetal rights in certain legal materials. What rights in the Iranian law have been considered for the fetus and what steps have been taken to protect the family in order to get more and more of the rights of the fetus? It can be said that under Iranian civil law, such as British law, the fetus has legal rights Because the right to property and property, inheritance, as well as the guarantee of appropriate performances if their rights are neglected by parents. And the adopted child in the New Family Protection Act despite the silence of civil law in this regard. This research intends to study the dimensions of the rights of children, its conditions and its effects in the law of Iran and the United Kingdom.
