

The role of banks in corporate governance and the performance of non-financial corporations sina sabermaashi*,

The introduction of the role of banks in relation to the capital market and information has occurred, which has led to the recognition of a new theory of financial intermediaries that banks have diverted their traditional role in attracting deposits and creating loans. As a result, financial intermediaries are not only a form of financing for companies with low funding, but also a mechanism for controlling and monitoring companies. The purpose of this study is to investigate the relationship between the role of banks as corporate governance with performance in non-financial corporations admitted to the stock market. The statistical population of the research is the companies listed in the Tehran Stock Exchange between 91 and 96 years, selected by systematic elimination of 406 companies. The library method was used to collect data and Eviews software was used to test the research hypotheses. The results of the research indicate that there is a lack of correlation between corporate governance (the bank as a shareholder) and financial performance, and there is a negative relationship between the bank as a lender with the financial performance of the company and the presence of a bank as a shareholder provides access to loans Facilitates the bank.
